By Matthew Robinson Love him or hate him, Drew Rosenhaus tells it like it is and he goes for his. I gotta respect that. People who hate Drew Rosenhaus, nine times out ten them same people are just mad that they don't have the balls or the courage to challenge the status quo in their chosen fields. Rosenhaus put a lot of life lessons and aphorisms in this book for future or current agents to live by. But he also dropped a lot of football names in this book to help keep football fans invested in the product (this book). I enjoyed this book and even though it's an eight-year-old book, you can still pick up some life lessons from this book that can help you whether you're a sports agent, rapper, teacher, janitor, cop, musician, actor, Wall Street warrior, or dishwasher. 9 of 9 people found the following review helpful. ego is not a dirty word, but it makes a boring read

By Anthony J. Holley I was hoping to get a genuine business insight into the business of being a sports agent. The insight I gained from reading this book is that this guy never made a mistake in his life and that despite conducting win/lose negotiations and ensuring that a contract doesn't mean much even if it has a year to run, he thinks he is honourable. The actual content summary would be as follows: Sign the players, spend as much time with them as possible. If the parents are involved, suck up to them big time. If you don't sign them, keep being nice to them. Negotiate hard, make it clear that player could and will "hold-out" and/or default on contract. The other content includes boasting about his brother marrying a cheer-leader and his Karate instructor being killed. The unexplained questions include how someone so egotistical can be as successful as he seems to be and whether it is true that he never calls or solicits the calls of players before they sign - he doth protesteth too much, as Shakespeare said. In case you think I don't like the guy, I am in Australia and had never heard of him - I wish I still hadn't, at least I'd still have the cash!
