FordJames and Wendy Kirkpatrick reinterpret Donald Kirkpatrick's four-level model of training evaluation. Evidence for training effectiveness can still be divided into reaction to training, learning measured immediately after training, transfer to the work environment, and impact on organizational performance. The authors find the concept of "return on investment" too calculatingly financial. Instead, they offer "return on expectation" as a measure--did we get what we wanted, even if those outcomes are not monetary?The Kirkpatrick's organize the book around the metaphor of a jury trial with the corporate training director as a defense attorney who must save the very life of the Training Department. A major tactic is to become a strategic partner of the other executives using the PARTNER steps of the Kirkpatrick Business Partnership Model. A graphic depiction of this model appears repeatedly in the book. The components are Pledge to work together, Address important jury issues, Refine expectations to define outcomes, Target critical behaviors and required drivers, Necessities for success, Execute the initiative, and Return on Expectations. The acronym is a little contrived, but it does help readers organize and remember the key concepts. There is a fair amount of practical advice in the book. It is only slightly diluted by lengthy sample "dialogues" between imaginary training directors and executives. There are also real examples of training success in specific business settings. The "stars" responsible for these successes are named and can be contacted for further details. I recommend this book to anyone with the responsibility of defending training activities in a corporate setting. It is readable, current, and does a good job making a case for the value of training. 1 of 2 people found the following review helpful. Pretty good book

By Laura M. Shemick This book, written by the son of a developer of a system to evaluate training, is a pretty good overview of the challenges in-house trainers face today. It's of slightly more limited value for trainers serving non-profits and for independent trainers serving the general for-profit and non-profit communities, but still has many valuable points to ponder. I'm not sure how much the developer or the son have read about classic adult education theory, but their attitudes are consistent with that theory and their writing can easily be reconciled with positions taken by adult education folks. I especially like how the developer and his son emphasize the importance of follow-up with participants, and their emphasis on observed behavioral changes and improvements in performance overall. "Return on expectations" is a nice concept, one that I hope replaces "return on investment." 1 of 2 people found the following review helpful. A logical approach to address the issue of training effectiveness.

By jasvinder singh Book shows entirely new way of looking at training programs, in terms of output. After reading I am convinced that soft skills can be linked with hardcore data of sales. As a trainer we need to change our own mindset toward training programs. Thanks for giving stepwise approach.

While upbeat lingo abounds about "complementing strategic objectives" and "driving productivity," the fact is that most training does not make a significant enough impact on business results, and when it does, training professionals fail to make a convincing case about the value added to the bottom line. The vaunted "business partnership model" has yet to be realized--and in tough economic times, when the training budget is often the first to be cut, training is on trial for its very existence. Using a courtroom trial as a metaphor, "Training on Trial" seeks to get to the truth about why training fails and puts the business partnership model to work for real. Readers on both sides of the "courtroom" will learn how to stop viewing training as a cost center, and bridge the gulf between what learning functions deliver and what business units need to execute their strategies. A thought-provoking read for trainers and business unit leaders alike, "Training on Trial" provides a new application of the Kirkpatrick Four-Level Evaluation Model and a multitude of tips and techniques that allow lessons learned to be put into action now.

"If you are a training manager...if you pay for training or request training, you need to read this book... then strongly suggest your training manager read it, too." Quality Progress

From the Inside Flap As you already know, training budgets are among the first to be cut when economic times get tough. Whether you're one of the in-house survivors or a struggling consultant, you can no longer coast on lofty notions about continuous learning and employee development. You need to provide compelling evidence that training delivers bottom-line results. "We do not have a choice but to defend ourselves," attests Dr. James D. Kirkpatrick, one of the world's most respected training and management consultants. In "Training on Trial," Kirkpatrick and his co-counsel, Wendy Kayser Kirkpatrick, guide you through every critical step of making a case for the value of training--whether to your CFO or to a potential client. Using a courtroom trial as a metaphor, the Kirkpatricks demonstrate how to refute the charge that training does not make a significant enough impact on business to justify its costs. To help you represent yourself to the jury--that is, whoever has the power to judge your relative value--the authors call on eminent industry expert Dr. Donald Kirkpatrick. Dr. Kirkpatrick's famous Four Level Evaluation Model has been adapted and applied to provide the foundation for your winning defense. With "Training on Trial" in your corner, you'll go beyond spouting training jargon to demonstrating the tactical and strategic business value of your training programs. While working toward creating irrefutable connections between all types of learning and performance, you'll come to:

- Build expertise and become genuinely involved in your company's or client's business.
- Pledge to work together to positively impact a pressing business need or pivotal business opportunity.
- Ask the jury their expectations and revise your own to be more realistic and mutually satisfying.
- Develop a plan, targeting the key drivers of performance success after training has taken place.
- Execute your initiative and deliver a stellar ROESM (Return on Expectations).

Throughout, you'll find key action points and business partner tips. To add to the case, the Kirkpatricks spotlight star case studies from their practice, including Georgia-Pacific, Clarian Health, Farm Credit Canada, and the U.S. Department of Defense. "Training on Trial" will give you an edge on enhancing the value of the learning development services you provide--before you're forced to defend your work. James D.
